World-Wide Progress Has Been Made In Lengthening Life Span

NEW YORK—World-wide progress has been made recently in lengthening the average lifetime, according to a report by statisticians which summarize latest available data on international longevity.

Gains generally have been greatest in countries which formerly had the least favorable record. Examples are Puerto Rico, in which average length of life has increased by more than 22 years in a 15-year period, and Ceylon, where the increase has been even more dramatic—17 years in an 8-year period. Mexico, Brazil, and Thailand have also achieved marked gains amounting to about one year annually.

In India the increase has been only about a quarter of a year annually.

The expectation of life at birth, according to the report, varies from a low of 32.1 years in India (1941-1950 to a high of 72.5 years in the Netherlands (1953-1955). Other outstanding records are 72.0 years for Sweden in 1951-55 and 71.0 years for Norway in 1946-50. Close behind follow Israel, England, New Zealand, and Canada, in each of which the figure now exceeds the Biblical three score and ten.

The 1955 figure for the United States is 69.5 years.

For the Soviet Union the average length of life is reported as 64 years for 1954-55. Among the satellite countries, Czechoslovakia shows an experience similar to the Soviet Union; East Germany and Hungary have appreciably better records; and Poland's is not good.

Roaches Migrate, Say Scientists

WASHINGTON—There are migrations of cockroaches, usually at night.

These great "marches" seldom have been observed, says Drs. Louis M. Roth and Edwin R. Willis, Quartermaster Corps scientists. The migrations, they point out, may play a considerable part in the role of these insects as carriers of disease.

On a dark, drizzly day—they cite a government entomologist's report—thousands of German cockroaches were observed to come from the rear of an old Washington restaurant and march directly across a muddy street to the building on the opposite side. Several men with brooms were unable to stop the advance.

The phenomenon resulted, it was believed at the time, from pressure of overpopulation. No insecticide, or other means of driving the insects out, had been used in the restaurant.

In Austin, Minn., a mass migration was witnessed from a city dump to a new sewage-treatment plant a quarter-mile away.

Cherokee Believed In Seven Heavens

WASHINGTON—A person lived seven times, died seven times, and rose progressively to seven heavens. Then, too old and too tired to enjoy even the delights of the seventh paradise, one passed permanently out of existence.

Such was the curious religious concept of North Carolina's Cherokee, now among the most progressive of all Indians. The picturesque mythology of the tribe is described by Dr. William Gilbert, research specialist of the Library of Congress. "The Cherokee believed," he recounts, "that the earth was flat, that the sun sets through a hole in the ground every night and rises through a hole in the ground in the east every morning . . ."

Emotional Difficulty Results In Poor Jobs

LOS ANGELES—Emotional difficulties are most frequently at the bottom of poor performance on the job, and it is geneally up to the supervisor to provide "first aid" through skilful counseling.

In this important responsibility, the supervisor must avoid three pitfalls, according to Dr. Phillip A. Goodwin, lecturer in psychology at the University of California Extension.

The supervisor should not become too sympathetic as this gives the worker a chance to avoid facing his real problem. The supervisor should not give advice, as this implies a smug superiority. Finally, the counselor should keep hands off really serious emotional problems.

King Of Cats

BUDAPEST—This fish's tail is probably bigger than most fishermen tales.

Istan Zambo claims to have caught the biggest catfish the River Tisza has produced in 30 years. It was 7 feet, 9 inches long and weighed over 222 pounds. Zambo caught it with a hook and line after a long fight.
